Thereof a mortal drank, therein He cleansed his spirit of its sin. His eyes caught stronger beams, and tears Were born to him of deep delight, A lofty music filled his ears, And there was offered to his sight The face of a majestic Soul, That was not wave nor wind nor light, But moved and murmured through the whole. Love is the daintiest thief that ever Slipped hither out of Paradise. Nought is so dark but he can sever, By the fine flashes of his eyes, The meaning nestling in its heart. No lore for him too wise or deep, He can explore with fiery art. He steals from the coy rose asleep The dreams she would to none impart, And ere the river can hasten by, He will its darting god espy. ### Reviews

This publication is amazing. It is definitely basic but shocks in the fifty percent of your publication. You wont feel monotony at anytime of your own time (that's what catalogues are for concerning if you question me).
