Many in the Queen s Court and elsewhere wondered that the Archbishop was so silent upon all these reflections, and that he made so little complaint as he did. This was signified to him by his fast friend, the Treasurer. But upon this the Archbishop drew up, first, a brief ac-Vindicates count of the Faculty Office, which yet he was not fond of at all; secondly, the reasons that he was not so forward to make his complaints; and thirdly, the vindication of himself in the expending of his revenues. Of all this he took some pains to write, for the instruction of the Treasurer, by way of private letter to him, that he might, as opportunity served, declare these matters to the Queen or others. But to be particular in a thing so materially relating to our good Prelate,...
